

Detroit lost its only classical music station when a large out-of-state owner decided it was not profitable enough. Although many formats have been tried at that signal, some of them canned programming from far away, none has ever even broken even. Still our pleas to Greater Media are unheard because they have no local connection and no understanding of the possibilities for profit and goodwill should classical programming return.

This is a small example that has affected us very personally with the degree of media consolidation that has already occurred. We cannot imagine that it is in society's best interests to limit the flow of ideas and opinions to a few large big owners who would also determine what we can turn to for entertainment and refreshment.
